The following pages list graduate courses on offer in English and related university programs. With permission of the Director of Graduate Studies, graduate students may enroll in 300-level courses which have been approved for graduate credit.
This course will explore how the concept of experience changes under the conditions of modernity, and particularly the ways in which the uniquely modern form of the novel either radicalizes or resists those changes. The classical concept of experience — best exemplified by Aristotle's dictum that good judgment requires experience — construed experience as a form of wisdom, acquired through habituation and narrative embedding. By contrast, empiricism (particularly in Locke) reconceived experience so that it refers to disaggregated and punctually encountered sense data, shorn of the narrative and fictional structures in which those data acquire meaning. How does the novel respond to these changes? The narration of individual subjective experience has long been understood to be one of the signal contributions of the modern novel. But experience in what sense? Some novels deepen the sense of shock, disorientation and estrangement that comes with the modern conception of experience, while others attempt to reconstitute the sense of meaning and narrative coherence that characterized an older concept of experience.

In this class, we will examine the history of the concept of experience and study philosophical accounts of experience, alongside readings of a range of eighteenth century novels, in order to better understand how the novel might come to serve as a privileged vehicle for mediating experience. How does experience become meaningful or purposive for an individual, rather than being encountered as mere data? In what ways are fictional structures, such as narrative and metaphor, essential to constituting that meaningfulness? How are judgments, founded on those fictional structures, integral to the constitution of meaning, rather than merely secondary and dispensable operations performed on already given data? In addition to examining novels in relation to philosophical accounts of experience, we will also read a broad selection of recent criticism that examines the relation between empiricism and the eighteenth-century novel.

Possible texts include:
Novels and other literature:

Philosophical accounts of experience:

Eighteenth-Century Criticism:

English 461
Studies in Contemporary Literature
The Queer and the Oriental
Andrew Leong   Thursday 2:00-5:00

The queer and the oriental are two figures on the wrong sides of Western conceptions of world history. Set as perverse deviations or inverse reflections of straight-line trajectories from despotic ancestral pasts to free reproductive futures, the queer and the oriental are two species of wrong which frustrate sublation into the generalities of “right” or “white.” Too wrong for history, these two wrongs also cannot be rectified or reduced into each other—but not for lack of trying. Over the course of the long twentieth century, a seemingly endless pile-up of cultural productions have positioned Orientals as queer or featured queers Orientalizing themselves and others. The mind-gagging glut of such productions illustrates how thoroughly their maneuvers never really work; or rather, how they work, like desires often do, by never being done.

The first third of the seminar will open with an intensive review of two texts that are axiomatic for contemporary queer and post-colonial theory: Michel Foucault's History of Sexuality, Vol. 1 (1976) and Edward Said's Orientalism (1978). We will reinforce our readings of Said and Foucault with a crash course in philosophy of world history (via Hegel, Marx, and Nietzsche). These readings will help us situate the uptake of “genealogy” as method in the work of Eve Kosofsky Sedgwick, Partha Chatterjee, Lisa Lowe, Kuan-Hsing Chen, and Sara Ahmed.

In the remaining two-thirds of the seminar, we will read queer, orientalist, and anti-orientalist literary and cinematic texts paired with appropriate critical readings based upon the group’s intellectual needs and research interests. Prospective texts include: Natsume Soseki’s Kokoro, E.M. Forster’s Passage to India, Virginia Woolf’s Orlando, Yoshiya Nobuko’s Yellow Rose, Maxine Hong Kingston’s China Men, Djuna Barnes’ Nightwood, Marguerite Duras’ The Lover, Samuel R. Delany’s The Mad Man, and Nic Wong’s Crevasse.

Since this is a Fall Quarter seminar, I will not require the production of an end-of-term research paper. (The option remains open for those seminar participants who wish to pursue it). The seminar will place more emphasis on reinforcing foundational skills of graduate-level knowledge production, such as close reading and reading for argumentative structure; preparation, construction, and analysis of field bibliographies or “lists”; and oral presentation, including prepared and extemporaneous delivery of questions and responses. In lieu of a final paper, the culminating elements of the seminar will be a conference paper or article proposal, a critical annotated bibliography, and a comprehensive review of the readings of the seminar as a whole.

English 471
Studies in American Literature
Border Literature
John Alba Cutler  Monday 2:00-5:00

The US-Mexico border has been the site of intense cultural conflict since the mid-nineteenth century. It marks both the connection and the division between two nations, and many of our most fraught conversations concern whether the border should be a bridge or a wall. As an entry point into these conversations, this course will survey literature and film centering on the US-Mexico border. Students will become familiar with the history of the border, beginning with the Treaty of Guadalupe-Hidalgo in 1848 and extending through NAFTA and up to the current political climate. Together we will consider how the border has become such a potent site for contemporary mythmaking, a flashpoint for anxieties about race, labor, gender, and sexuality.

Texts will include:

Theatre & Drama 503
Interdisciplinary Studies in Theatre & Performance
Re-performing the Avant Garde
Susan Manning  Tuesday 2:00-5:00

Over the last decade or two, contemporary artists in dance, theatre, and visual art have pursued “reperformance,” that is, revisiting earlier icons of the avant-garde and staging self-reflexive commentaries on the process. Yet, however new the term “reperformance,” artists throughout the twentieth century have reenacted earlier avant-garde moments. This course asks if and how the contemporary trend of reperformance differs from twentieth-century practices of art making, exhibition, and historiography. In so doing, the course also serves as a survey of avant-garde performance over the last century.

Winter Quarter

English 422/Comp Lit 413
Studies in Medieval Literature
Sacred and Profane: Studies in Medieval Crossover
Barbara Newman  Monday 2:00-5:00

Medievalists are in the habit of distinguishing sacred from secular texts, but some of the most vibrant and interesting cultural production lay on the borderline, in the terrain of “crossover.” Courtly love lyrics could be indistinguishable from devotional poems to the Virgin, while motets interwove liturgical phrases with the melodies of popular songs. Bawdy fabliaux might return with tweaking as miracle stories. Bestiaries, originally a genre of moralized natural science, could be put to erotic or political use. The hybrid genre of hagiographic romance represents virgin martyrs as erotic heroines and the sorcerer Merlin as a parodic saint, while the Grail romances turn chivalry on its head to promote ascetic chastity and eucharistic piety. What did medieval audiences make of such ambiguities? What textual markers enable us to distinguish respectful homage from tongue-in-cheek parody, or audacious sacrilege from the sincerest form of flattery? In this seminar we will read medieval texts in a range of genres (lyric, romance, beast allegory, pseudo-hagiography, and mystical dialogue), exploring as many variants of crossover as our brief quarter permits. Middle English works will be read in the original, French texts in translation, but I am happy to offer tutoring in Old and Middle French for those who are proficient in the modern language.

Evaluation methods:
class participation, one oral presentation (accompanied by a 5-page paper), term paper of about 15 pages

Texts:
Chrétien de Troyes, Lancelot, or The Knight of the Cart; The Quest of the Holy Graal; Amis and Amiloun; Sir Gawther; English bestiary (Oxford, MS. Bodley 764), ed. Richard Barber; Richard de Fournival, Master Richard's Bestiary of Love, with the Lady's response; John C. Hirsh, ed., Medieval Lyric: Middle English Lyrics, Ballads, and Carols; Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun, The Romance of the Rose; Marguerite Porete, The Mirror of Simple Souls.

English 434
Studies in Shakespeare & Early Drama
Renaissance Drama
Jeffrey Masten Wednesday 2:00-5:00

The seminar will serve as both a survey of English drama between 1580 and 1642 – to the extent that the immense output of Shakespeare's prolific contemporaries can be surveyed in one course – and an introduction to research and interpretive methods that have been used to study these plays. At the site of some relatively canonical selections, we will engage with such “traditional” methods as early performance/theatre history, textual bibliography and the history of the book, as well as various and proliferating modes of recent interpretation and criticism (historicism and materialism, psychoanalysis, feminism and early women's writing, and queer history/theory, among others). Additional key words will include: periodization (“Renaissance”), canon (“drama”), (trans) nationalism (“English”), and “non-Shakespearean.”

Requirements:
a shorter and longer essay; presentations on performance

English 471
Studies in American Literature
American Women Auteurs, Novels, and Films: 1900-1945
Julia Stern Thursday 2:00-5:00

American Women Auteurs centers around five novelists – Sarah Orne Jewett, Kate Chopin, Edith Wharton, Willa Cather, and Nella Larsen. That is, we move from the exquisite local color realism of Jewett’s spinster-filled Maine to Chopin’s “creole Bovary” set in fin de siècle New Orleans to Wharton’s anthropological vision of Old New York’s tribal mores for women, to Cather’s enabling Nebraska prairies and historical ante-bellum Virginia to Larsen’s Renaissance Harlem, Tuskegee, and rural black belt South. The seminar pairs both Jane Campion’s The Piano and an all-star set of Bette Davis’s greatest classical Hollywood films with these novels: The Country of the Pointed Firs and Deephaven with The Piano, Jezebel with The Awakening, Dark Victory and Now Voyager with The House of Mirth and The Age of Innocence; Whatever Happened to Baby Jane? with Sapphire and the Slave Girl and My Antonia; and In This Our Life with Quicksand and Passing. Augmenting this relatively heavy reading list will be theoretical essays on authorship by Foucault and Barthes; star theory; essays on spectatorship; and genre criticism on melodramatic, gothic, and sentimental forms.

English 481/Comp Lit 481
Studies in Literary Theory & Criticism
Historicism: Uses and Abuses
Harris Feinsod Tuesday 2:00-5:00

This course adapts its title from Friedrich Nietzsche’s essay “Vom Nutzen und Nachteil der Historie für das Leben” (“On the Use and Abuse of History for Life,” 1874). Beginning with nineteenth- and early twentieth-century debates about historical materialism and the uses of history and literary history as disciplines (Michelet, Taine, Croce, Nietzsche, Ortega y Gasset, Mariátegui, Benjamin and Adorno), we will go on to survey the development and invocations of historicism, new historicism, and post-historicism as approaches to literary study across early modern, romantic, victorian, modern and postcolonial literatures. How does historicism fare in addressing diverse periods? For example, while early modern and victorian studies have recently seen minor insurgencies against dominant tendencies toward “positivist historicism,” some of the most energizing recent work in twentieth-century literary studies has been deeply historicist in inclination. Must we continue to follow Jameson’s famous injunction to “always historicize,” or do we rather find ourselves in a “weak” theoretical state of affairs by which “we cannot not historicize”? How do we understand Roland Barthes’s claim that “a little formalism turns one away from History, but … a lot brings one back to it”? What is historicism good for? What are its varieties? Where does it fall short?

In addition to above-mentioned names, readings may include selections from Edmundo O’Gorman, Michel Foucault, Hayden White, Fredric Jameson, Raymond Williams, Stuart Hall, Edouard Glissant, Peter Sloterdijk, Catherine Gallagher, Michael Denning, Eve Sedgwick, Roberto Fernández Retamar, Sylvia Federici, and/or Dipesh Chakrabarty. We will test our claims on a novel or two and a few poems, to be selected by students.

Spring Quarter

English 431
Studies in 16th-Century Literature
Early Modern Literature of Grief
Kasey Evans Wednesday 2:00-5:00

Focusing on English literature surrounding the Protestant Reformation, this course considers the ways in which literature supplemented and/or displaced some of the work of grief and mourning formerly reserved for religious ritual. Historians have long argued that the Reformation created a more absolute understanding of the finality of death, a more unbreachable division between the dead and the living. And yet literary texts of the period continued to explore human attitudes about death; salutary and deleterious desires for death; ways to prepare for a good death; and various forms, stages, and postures of grief. This course will explore such texts from multiple genres, and consider the kinds of psychic and social work they perform in this period of religious upheaval. Theoretical readings will include foundational works of psychoanalysis, and this course will take as one of its central questions the value and the limits of psychoanalytic reading as applied to pre-modern texts.

Primary texts will include More’s Supplication of Souls, Donne’s Devotions Upon Emergent Occasions, Browne’s Hydriotaphia, Shakespeare’s Hamlet and King Lear, Thomas Lodge’s Prosopopoeia, and Milton’s Lycidas; theoretical readings will include Freud, Lacan, Kristeva, and Klein.

English 455
Studies in Victorian Literature
Victorian Novel and Society
Chris Herbert Thursday 2:00-5:00

We will begin by reading several scientific histories of British society in the age of the Industrial Revolution—histories that in various fundamental respects contradict one another and raise in pressing fashion the question of the fictiveness and the mythic character of scholarly knowledge of the past. Then we will turn to a series of some of the most noteworthy fictions by which Victorian society sought to represent itself to itself. We will try to correlate the fictions of twentieth-century social historians with those of Victorian popular writers, not so much to assess the historical reliability of either of these categories of texts as to set up an interpretive interplay between them and to try to describe the dependency of nineteenth-century novelistic creativity upon a certain repertoire of historical imagination.

Reading:
E. P. Thompson, The Making of the English Working Class
ISBN 0394703227
Harold Perkin, The Origins of Modern English Society
ISBN 0415298903
F. M. L. Thompson, The Rise of Respectable Society
ISBN 0674772865
Friedrich Engels, The Condition of the Working Class in England
ISBN 0804706344
Elizabeth Gaskell, Mary Barton
ISBN 0679434941 (subject to change - might become 0192835106)
Anthony Trollope, Doctor Thorne
ISBN 0192815083
Samuel Butler, The Way of All Flesh
ISBN 0140430121

English 461/Comp Lit 486
Studies in Contemporary Literature
Indian Ocean Epistemologies
Evan Mwangi Monday 2:00-5:00

With the dominance of the Atlantic as a model for the study of cultural exchanges between continents, the Indian Ocean is often excluded from critical theory discussions despite its centrality in the circulations of various philosophical traditions in Africa, Asia, Australia, New Zealand, and Latin America. This course will use literary and philosophical texts from and about the Indian Ocean to comparatively examine how intellectuals and artists have viewed the world using scripts and terms different from those developed in the West. It is out of convenience that we use epistemology as an entry point toward a comprehensive engagement with Indian Ocean critical theory; much of the philosophical debates from the region (e.g., work by Mbiti, Nyerere, Tempel, Masolo) are on epistemological issues. However, a transdisciplinary reading of each text will engage with various perceptions of the critical practice the Global South, including the interface of aesthetics and activism. Taking Indian Ocean theories of knowledge as multiple because of their diverse sources and cross-cultural interactions for centuries, the course will be interested in unearthing the splintering differences among the philosophers and the changes over time in what might be considered a single school of thought. We read works by such thinkers as Bonaventura de Sousa Santos, Ngugi wa Thiong’o, Valentin Mudimbe, Sugata Bose, Sharifa Ahjum, and Achille Mbembe, especially in relation to their critiques or repurposing of western epistemologies. Indian Ocean philosophical traditions to be compared with western ones (and with one another) include Sufism, Negritude, Créolité, Transmodernism, Coolitude, and Ubuntu.

Evaluation method(s):
7000-word essay, annotated bibliographies.

Texts (tentative)

English 471
Studies in American Literature
Emerson & Whitman
Jay Grossman Tuesday 2:00-5:00

This course has three goals: to provide an opportunity for intensive close analysis of a wide sampling of the writings of Emerson and Whitman, including many of the “major” works, as well as some writings that have been under-canonized or under-utilized (including Whitman’s early fiction and newspaper writings, and Emerson’s journals); to gain perspective on the (literary) relationship between these two “major” figures as it has been variously projected since the nineteenth century; and, finally, to use the occasion of these writings to interrogate the concept of literary history itself—including, for example, the word “major” in this course description—along with the theoretical underpinnings and plausibility of historical approaches to literature.

Evaluation method(s):
Active participation in the seminar (which may include short presentations); papers